

The Adventure of the Speckled Band

By

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle

*A Special Edition Published for the 2008-2009
Sherlock Holmes Essay Contest for Seventh Grade
Students Sponsored by Watson's Tin Box of Ellicott
City in Collaboration with Howard County Library and Howard County Public Schools*

This booklet contains the story, essay contest rules, suggestions to help students read the story critically and write an essay, a glossary of British terms found in the story, recommended essay questions, and the rubric that will be used to judge the essays.

Copyright 2008

The story The Adventure of the Speckled Band is in the public domain, and Watson's Tin Box of Ellicott City holds no rights to its content. Watson's Tin Box of Ellicott City and Cathy Schorreck hold the copyright for all other content in this booklet. The content in this booklet may not be reproduced for any purpose other than the 2008-2009 Sherlock Holmes Essay Contest without the express permission of Watson's Tin Box of Ellicott City. Individual contributors will retain copyright of their contributed material.

Watson's Tin Box of Ellicott City
In care of 5612 Thicket Lane
Columbia, MD 21044

Acknowledgements

Watson's Tin Box of Ellicott City is very grateful to:

Howard County Library

In particular, we would like to thank Valerie Gross, Executive Director & CEO, Katie George, Teen Program Coordinator, and other staff at the Library for supporting this initiative, agreeing to be our collaborators, and bringing the Tin Box together with Howard County Public Schools.

Howard County Public Schools

In particular, we would like to thank Sharon Stein for being our collaborator and Zeleana Morris for being our coordinator.

Special thanks go to:

Cathy Schorreck, Eighth Grade Teacher and Head of the Middle School English Department at the McDonogh School, for taking a special interest in this initiative. Ms. Schorreck's willingness to provide advice and guidance (which led to her co-authoring this booklet) improved it beyond measure. Also, thanks to Karen Eckstein, at the time a Seventh Grade English Teacher at Lime Kiln Middle School, for her suggestions for improving the booklet.

Table of Contents

Introduction.....	3
Contest Rules.....	4
The Adventure of the Speckled Band.....	7
Glossary of Terms Used in the Story.....	37
A Reader's Guide.....	39
Arthur Conan Doyle.....	39
Pre-Reading Activities.....	45
 Reading Approach.....	46
Critical Reading Questions.....	46
Post Reading Activities.....	47
Some Factual Questions.....	48
Some Analytical Questions.....	49
Essay Writing Tips.....	49
Thinking About Your Essay.....	50
The Traditional Structural Rules.....	51
Essay Questions.....	52
Rubric to be Used in Judging the Contest.....	55
Official Entry Form and Cover Sheet.....	56

Introduction

Sherlock Holmes has survived the last 125 years as one of the most famous literary characters of all time. Mostly, that is due to the talent of Arthur Conan Doyle who made him seem so real. Generations of readers have felt the chill of the reading the Adventure of the Speckled Band and have marveled at Holmes's skill at deducing how a crime was committed.

There are sixty Sherlock Holmes stories written by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. While "Sherlockians" like to argue about when the Holmes adventures were supposed to have taken place, it is generally agreed that they took place between 1874 and 1914. Therefore, we have a chronicle of forty years of Sherlock Holmes's life. We can see Sherlock Holmes develop and mature. We can find inconsistencies among the stories. We love to re-read the stories and analyze them. People have been analyzing (and enjoying) Sherlock Holmes stories ever since they first appeared.

“Watson’s Tin Box of Ellicott City,” the Sherlock Holmes Society that is sponsoring this contest, is a literary society that is made up of people who love to read. Founded in 1989, it has met every month to discuss a different Sherlock Holmes story. The Tin Box is sponsoring this contest in order to encourage young people to read, to encourage them to read critically, to introduce them to Sherlock Holmes, and to encourage them to write well.

We hope that throughout the rest of your life you feel the interest to return to Sherlock Holmes from time to time and enjoy the fun of hearing Holmes say to Watson, “The game is afoot.” There is a worldwide community of people who love Sherlock Holmes. If your interest in Holmes continues, feel free to join in.

We hope that you enjoy the Adventure of the Speckled Band. Good luck with your essay.

Contest Rules

1. This contest is targeting students at the 7th Grade level.
2. Parents and teachers may not write or edit the essay for entrants. These essays should be entirely the work of the 7th Graders.
3. Please read the section of this booklet entitled Essay Questions carefully before you start the essay. It includes questions that teachers or parents may wish to assign to the student as the subject of his/her essay.
4. Essays must include a stapled cover sheet/entry form with the following information:
 - a. The student’s name,
 - b. The grade level,

- c. Age,
 - d. Home Address,
 - e. Phone number,
 - f. Sponsoring teacher's name (if entering via the Library, please still identify your teacher),
 - g. School name (home-schooled students may just indicate such), and
 - h. School address.
5. An official entry form is included in this booklet. A student should photocopy the entry form and staple it to the front of his/her essay. Essays received by Watson's Tin Box without a stapled cover sheet will not be read and will not be eligible for prizes.
 6. Essays are to be written in English, word-processed, 12-point font size, double-spaced. All pages must be stapled together.
 7. A rubric identifying the criteria by which essays will be judged is included in this booklet. Contestants may want to review the rubric before they begin their essays.
 8. Teachers may submit no more than two essays per class to the Tin Box for final judging.
 9. Essays must be received by Watson's Tin Box, in care of 5612 Thicket Lane, Columbia, MD 21044, no later than June 5, 2009 to be eligible for the prizes. However, teachers or other entrants may submit essays at any time during the contest and need not wait until the end of the contest period.
 10. Essays received by Watson's Tin Box will not be returned to the student or the teacher.

Prizes:

The Grand Prize winner will receive a Gift Card to Barnes & Noble Booksellers worth $50. He/she will also receive a copy of the Complete Sherlock Holmes and a certificate from Watson's Tin Box. His/her essay will be published in the next publication of Watson's Tin Box.

The Second and Third Prize winners will each receive Gift Cards to Barnes & Noble Booksellers worth $25. Each also will receive a copy of the Complete Sherlock Holmes and a certificate from Watson's Tin Box.

The winners will be announced by mid June 2009, and there will be an Awards Program at the Library in late June.

The Adventure of the Speckled Band
- Sir Arthur Conan Doyle

In glancing over my notes of the seventy odd cases in which I have during the last eight years studied the methods of my friend Sherlock Holmes, I find many tragic, some comic, a large number merely strange, but none commonplace; for, working as he did rather for the love of his art than for the acquirement of wealth, he refused to associate himself with any investigation which did not tend towards the unusual, and even the fantastic. Of all these varied cases, however, I cannot recall any which presented more singular features than that which was associated with the well-known Surrey family of the Roylotts of Stoke Moran. The events in question occurred in the early days of my association with Holmes, when we were sharing rooms as bachelors in Baker Street. It is possible that I might have placed them upon record before, but a promise of secrecy was made at the time, from which I have only been freed during the last month by the untimely death of the lady to whom the pledge was given. It is perhaps as well that the facts should now come to light, for I have reasons to know that there are widespread rumours as to the death of Dr. Grimesby Roylott which tend to make the matter even more terrible than the truth.

It was early in April in the year '83 that I woke one morning to find Sherlock Holmes standing, fully dressed, by the side of my bed. He was a late riser, as a rule, and as the clock on the mantelpiece showed me that it was only a quarter-past seven, I blinked up at him in some surprise, and perhaps just a little resentment, for I was myself regular in my habits.

"Very sorry to knock you up, Watson," said he, "but it's the common lot this morning. Mrs. Hudson has been knocked up, she retorted upon me, and I on you."

"What is it, then -- a fire?"

"No; a client. It seems that a young lady has arrived in a considerable state of excitement, who insists upon seeing me. She is waiting now in the sitting-room. Now, when young ladies wander about the metropolis at this hour of the morning, and knock sleepy people up out of their beds, I presume that it is something very pressing which they have to communicate. Should it prove to be an interesting case, you would, I am sure, wish to follow it from the outset. I thought, at any rate, that I should call you and give you the chance."

"My dear fellow, I would not miss it for anything."

I had no keener pleasure than in following Holmes in his professional investigations, and in admiring the rapid deductions, as swift as intuitions, and yet always founded on a logical basis with which he unraveled the problems which were submitted to him. I rapidly threw on my clothes and was ready in a few minutes to accompany my friend down to the sitting-room. A lady dressed in black and heavily veiled, who had been sitting in the window, rose as we entered.

"Good-morning, madam," said Holmes cheerily. "My name is Sherlock Holmes. This is my intimate friend and associate, Dr. Watson, before whom you can speak as freely as before myself. Ha! I am glad to see that Mrs. Hudson has had the good sense to light the fire. Pray draw up to it, and I shall order you a cup of hot coffee, for I observe that you are shivering."

"It is not cold which makes me shiver," said the woman in a low voice, changing her seat as requested.

"What, then?"

"It is fear, Mr. Holmes. It is terror." She raised her veil as she spoke, and we could see that she was indeed in a pitiable state of agitation, her face all drawn and gray, with restless frightened eyes, like those of some hunted animal. Her features and figure were those of a woman of thirty, but her hair was shot with premature gray, and her expression was weary and haggard. Sherlock Holmes ran her over with one of his quick, all-comprehensive glances.

"You must not fear," said he soothingly, bending forward and patting her forearm. "We shall soon set matters right, I have no doubt. You have come in by train this morning, I see."

"You know me, then?"

"No, but I observe the second half of a return ticket in the palm of your left glove. You must have started early, and yet you had a good drive in a dog-cart, along heavy roads, before you reached the station."

The lady gave a violent start and stared in bewilderment at my companion.

"There is no mystery, my dear madam," said he, smiling. "The left arm of your jacket is spattered with mud in no less than seven places. The marks are perfectly fresh. There is no vehicle save a dog-cart which throws up mud in that way, and then only when you sit on the left-hand side of the driver."

"Whatever your reasons may be, you are perfectly correct," said she. "I started from home before six, reached Leatherhead at twenty past, and came in by the first train to Waterloo. Sir, I can stand this strain no longer; I shall go mad if it continues. I have no one to turn to -none, save only one, who cares for me, and he, poor fellow, can be of little aid. I have heard of you, Mr. Holmes; I have heard of you from Mrs. Farintosh, whom you helped in the hour of her sore need. It was from her that I had your address. Oh, sir, do you not think that you could help me, too, and at least throw a little light through the dense darkness which surrounds me? At present it is out of my power to reward you for your services, but in a month or six weeks I shall be married, with the control of my own income, and then at least you shall not find me ungrateful."

Holmes turned to his desk and, unlocking it, drew out a small case-book, which he consulted.

"Farintosh," said he. "Ah yes, I recall the case; it was concerned with an opal tiara. I think it was before your time, Watson. I can only say, madam, that I shall be happy to devote the same care to your case as I did to that of your friend. As to reward, my profession is its own reward; but you are at liberty to defray whatever expenses I may be put to, at the time which suits you best. And now I beg that you will lay before us everything that may help us in forming an opinion upon the matter."

"Alas!" replied our visitor, "the very horror of my situation lies in the fact that my fears are so vague, and my suspicions depend so entirely upon small points, which might seem trivial to another, that even he to whom of all others I have a right to look for help and advice looks upon all that I tell him about it as the fancies of a nervous woman. He does not say so, but I can read it from his soothing answers and averted eyes. But I have heard, Mr. Holmes, that you can see deeply into the manifold wickedness of the human heart. You may advise me how to walk amid the dangers which encompass me."

"I am all attention, madam."

"My name is Helen Stoner, and I am living with my stepfather, who is the last survivor of one of the oldest Saxon families in England, the Royslotts of Stoke Moran, on the western border of Surrey."

Holmes nodded his head. "The name is familiar to me," said he.

"The family was at one time among the richest in England, and the estates extended over the borders into Berkshire in the north, and Hampshire in the west. In the last century, however, four successive heirs were of a dissolute and wasteful disposition, and the family ruin was eventually completed by a gambler in the days of the Regency. Nothing was left save a few acres of ground, and the two-hundred-year-old house, which is itself crushed under a heavy mortgage. The last squire dragged out his existence there, living the horrible life of an aristocratic pauper; but his only son, my stepfather, seeing that he must adapt himself to the new conditions, obtained an advance from a relative, which enabled him to take a medical degree and went out to Calcutta, where, by his professional skill and his force of character, he established a large practice. In a fit of anger, however, caused by some robberies which had been perpetrated in the house, he beat his native butler to death and narrowly escaped a capital sentence. As it was, he suffered a long term of imprisonment and afterwards returned to England a morose and disappointed man.

"When Dr. Royslott was in India he married my mother, Mrs. Stoner, the young widow of Major-General Stoner, of the Bengal Artillery. My sister Julia and I were twins, and we were only two years old at the time of my mother's re-marriage. She had a considerable sum of money -- not less than a thousand a year, and this she bequeathed to Dr. Royslott entirely while we resided with him, with a provision that a certain annual sum should be allowed to each of us in the event of our marriage. Shortly after our return to England my mother died -- she was killed eight years ago in a railway accident near Crewe. Dr. Royslott then abandoned his attempts to establish himself in practice in London and took us to live with him in the old ancestral house at Stoke Moran. The money which my mother had left was enough for all our wants, and there seemed to be no obstacle to our happiness.

"But a terrible change came over our stepfather about this time. Instead of making friends and exchanging visits with our neighbours, who had at first been overjoyed to see a Royslott of Stoke Moran back in the old family seat, he shut himself up in his house and seldom came out save to indulge in ferocious quarrels with whoever might cross his path. Violence of temper approaching to mania has been hereditary in the men of the family, and in my stepfather's case it had, I believe, been intensified by his long residence in the tropics. A series of disgraceful brawls took place, two of which ended in the policecourt, until at last he became the terror of the village, and the folks would fly at his approach, for he is a man of immense strength, and absolutely uncontrollable in his anger.

"Last week he hurled the local blacksmith over a parapet into a stream, and it was only by paying over all the money which I could gather together that I was able to avert another public exposure. He had no friends at all save the wandering gypsies, and he would give these vagabonds leave to encamp upon the few acres of bramble-covered land which represent the family estate, and would accept in return the hospitality of their tents, wandering away with them sometimes for weeks on end. He has a passion also for Indian animals, which are sent over to him by a correspondent, and he has at this moment a cheetah and a baboon, which wander freely over his grounds and are feared by the villagers almost as much as their master.

"You can imagine from what I say that my poor sister Julia and I had no great pleasure in our lives. No servant would stay with us, and for a long time we did all the work of the house. She was but thirty at the time of her death, and yet her hair had already begun to whiten, even as mine has."

"Your sister is dead, then?"

"She died just two years ago, and it is of her death that I wish to speak to you. You can understand that, living the life which I have described, we were little likely to see anyone of our own age and position. We had, however, an aunt, my mother's maiden sister, Miss Honoria Westphail, who lives near Harrow, and we were occasionally allowed to pay short visits at this lady's house. Julia went there at Christmas two years ago, and met there a half-pay major of marines, to whom she became engaged. My stepfather learned of the engagement when my sister returned and offered no objection to the marriage; but within a fortnight of the day which had been fixed for the wedding, the terrible event occurred which has deprived me of my only companion."

Sherlock Holmes had been leaning back in his chair with his eyes closed and his head sunk in a cushion, but he half opened his lids now and glanced across at his visitor.

"Pray be precise as to details," said he.

"It is easy for me to be so, for every event of that dreadful time is seared into my memory. The manor-house is, as I have already said, very old, and only one wing is now inhabited. The bedrooms in this wing are on the ground floor, the sitting-rooms being in the central block of the buildings. Of these bedrooms the first is Dr. Roylott's, the second my sister's, and the third my own. There is no communication between them, but they all open out into the same corridor. Do I make myself plain?"

"Perfectly so."

"The windows of the three rooms open out upon the lawn. That fatal night Dr. Roylott had gone to his room early, though we knew that he had not retired to rest, for my sister was troubled by the smell of the strong Indian cigars which it was his custom to smoke. She left her room, therefore, and came into mine, where she sat for some time, chatting about her approaching wedding. At eleven o'clock she rose to leave me, but she paused at the door and looked back.

"'Tell me, Helen,' said she, 'have you ever heard anyone whistle in the dead of the night?'

"'Never,' said I.

"I suppose that you could not possibly whistle, yourself, in your sleep?"

"Certainly not. But why?"

"Because during the last few nights I have always, about three in the morning, heard a low, clear whistle. I am a light sleeper, and it has awakened me. I cannot tell where it came from perhaps from the next room, perhaps from the lawn. I thought that I would just ask you whether you had heard it."

"No, I have not. It must be those wretched gypsies in the plantation."

"Very likely. And yet if it were on the lawn, I wonder that you did not hear it also."

"Ah, but I sleep more heavily than you."

"Well, it is of no great consequence, at any rate." She smiled back at me, closed my door, and a few moments later I heard her key turn in the lock."

"Indeed," said Holmes. "Was it your custom always to lock yourselves in at night?"

"Always."

"And why?"

"I think that I mentioned to you that the doctor kept a cheetah and a baboon. We had no feeling of security unless our doors were locked."

"Quite so. Pray proceed with your statement."

"I could not sleep that night. A vague feeling of impending misfortune impressed me. My sister and I, you will recollect, were twins, and you know how subtle are the links which bind two souls which are so closely allied. It was a wild night. The wind was howling outside, and the rain was beating and splashing against the windows. Suddenly, amid all the hubbub of the gale, there burst forth the wild scream of a terrified woman. I knew that it was my sister's voice. I sprang from my bed, wrapped a shawl round me, and rushed into the corridor. As I opened my door I seemed to hear a low whistle, such as my sister described, and a few moments later a clanging sound, as if a mass of metal had fallen. As I ran down the passage, my sister's door was unlocked, and revolved slowly upon its hinges. I stared at it horror-stricken, not knowing what was about to issue from it. By the light of the corridor-lamp I saw my sister appear at the opening, her face blanched with terror, her hands groping for help, her whole figure swaying to and fro like that of a drunkard. I ran to her and threw my arms round her, but at that moment her knees seemed to give way and she fell to the ground. She writhed as one who is in terrible pain, and her limbs were dreadfully convulsed. At first I thought that she had not recognized me, but as I bent over her she suddenly shrieked out in a voice which I shall never forget, 'Oh, my God! Helen! It was the band! The speckled band!' There was something else which she would fain have said, and she stabbed with her finger into the air in the direction of the doctor's room, but a fresh convulsion seized her and choked her words. I rushed out, calling loudly for my stepfather, and I met him hastening from his room in his dressing-gown. When he reached my sister's side she was unconscious, and though he poured brandy down her throat and sent for medical aid from the village, all efforts were in vain, for she slowly sank and died without having recovered her consciousness. Such was the dreadful end of my beloved sister."

"One moment," said Holmes, "are you sure about this whistle and metallic sound? Could you swear to it?"

"That was what the county coroner asked me at the inquiry. It is my strong impression that I heard it, and yet, among the crash of the gale and the creaking of an old house, I may possibly have been deceived."

"Was your sister dressed?"

"No, she was in her night-dress. In her right hand was found the charred stump of a match, and in her left a match-box."

"Showing that she had struck a light and looked about her when the alarm took place. That is important. And what conclusions did the coroner come to?"

"He investigated the case with great care, for Dr. Roylott's conduct had long been notorious in the county, but he was unable to find any satisfactory cause of death. My evidence showed that the door had been fastened upon the inner side, and the windows were blocked by old-fashioned shutters with broad iron bars, which were secured every night. The walls were carefully sounded, and were shown to be quite solid all round, and the flooring was also thoroughly examined, with the same result. The chimney is wide, but is barred up by four large staples. It is certain, therefore, that my sister was quite alone when she met her end. Besides, there were no marks of any violence upon her."

"How about poison?"

"The doctors examined her for it, but without success."

"What do you think that this unfortunate lady died of, then?"

"It is my belief that she died of pure fear and nervous shock, though what it was that frightened her I cannot imagine."

"Were there gypsies in the plantation at the time?"

"Yes, there are nearly always some there."

"Ah, and what did you gather from this allusion to a band—a speckled band?"

"Sometimes I have thought that it was merely the wild talk of delirium, sometimes that it may have referred to some band of people, perhaps to these very gypsies in the plantation. I do not know whether the spotted handkerchiefs which so many of them wear over their heads might have suggested the strange adjective which she used."

Holmes shook his head like a man who is far from being satisfied..

"These are very deep waters," said he; "pray go on with your narrative."

"Two years have passed since then, and my life has been until lately lonelier than ever. A month ago, however, a dear friend, whom I have known for many years, has done me the honour to ask my hand in marriage. His name is Armitage -- Percy Armitage -- the second son of Mr. Armitage, of Crane Water, near Reading. My stepfather has offered no opposition to the match, and we are to be married in the course of the spring. Two days ago some repairs were started in the west wing of the building, and my bedroom wall has been pierced, so that I have had to move into the chamber in which my sister died, and to sleep in the very bed in which she slept. Imagine, then, my thrill of terror when last night, as I lay awake, thinking over her terrible fate, I suddenly heard in the silence of the night the low whistle which had been the herald of her own death. I sprang up and lit the lamp, but nothing was to be seen in the room. I was too shaken to go to bed again, however, so I dressed, and as soon as it was daylight I slipped down, got a dog-cart at the Crown Inn, which is opposite, and drove to Leatherhead, from whence I have come on this morning with the one object of seeing you and asking your advice."

"You have done wisely," said my friend. "But have you told me all?"

"Yes, all."

"Miss Stoner, you have not. You are screening your stepfather."

"Why, what do you mean?"

For answer Holmes pushed back the frill of black lace which fringed the hand that lay upon our visitor's knee. Five little livid spots, the marks of four fingers and a thumb, were printed upon the white wrist.

"You have been cruelly used," said Holmes.

The lady coloured deeply and covered over her injured wrist. "He is a hard man," she said, "and perhaps he hardly knows his own strength."

There was a long silence, during which Holmes leaned his chin upon his hands and stared into the crackling fire.

"This is a very deep business," he said at last. "There are a thousand details which I should desire to know before I decide upon our course of action. Yet we have not a moment to lose. If we were to come to Stoke Moran to-day, would it be possible for us to see over these rooms without the knowledge of your stepfather?"

"As it happens, he spoke of coming into town to-day upon some most important business. It is probable that he will be away all day, and that there would be nothing to disturb you. We have a housekeeper now, but she is old and foolish, and I could easily get her out of the way."

"Excellent. You are not averse to this trip, Watson?"

"By no means."

"Then we shall both come. What are you going to do yourself?"

"I have one or two things which I would wish to do now that I am in town. But I shall return by the twelve o'clock train, so as to be there in time for your coming."

"And you may expect us early in the afternoon. I have myself some small business matters to attend to. Will you not wait and breakfast?"

"No, I must go. My heart is lightened already since I have confided my trouble to you. I shall look forward to seeing you again this afternoon." She dropped her thick black veil over her face and glided from the room.

"And what do you think of it all, Watson?" asked Sherlock Holmes, leaning back in his chair.

"It seems to me to be a most dark and sinister business."

"Dark enough and sinister enough."

"Yet if the lady is correct in saying that the flooring and walls are sound, and that the door, window, and chimney are impassable, then her sister must have been undoubtedly alone when she met her mysterious end."

"What becomes, then, of these nocturnal whistles, and what of the very peculiar words of the dying woman?"

"I cannot think."

"When you combine the ideas of whistles at night, the presence of a band of gypsies who are on intimate terms with this old doctor, the fact that we have every reason to believe that the doctor has an interest in preventing his stepdaughter's marriage, the dying allusion to a band, and, finally, the fact that Miss Helen Stoner heard a metallic clang, which might have been caused by one of those metal bars that secured the shutters falling back into its place, I think that there is good ground to think that the mystery may be cleared along those lines."

"But what, then, did the gypsies do?"

"I cannot imagine."

"I see many objections to any such theory."

"And so do I. It is precisely for that reason that we are going to Stoke Moran this day. I want to see whether the objections are fatal, or if they may be explained away. But what in the name of the devil!"

The ejaculation had been drawn from my companion by the fact that our door had been suddenly dashed open, and that a huge man had framed himself in the aperture. His costume was a peculiar mixture of the professional and of the agricultural, having a black top-hat, a long frock-coat, and a pair of high gaiters, with a hunting-crop swinging in his hand. So tall was he that his hat actually brushed the cross-bar of the doorway, and his breadth seemed to span it across from side to side. A large face, seared with a thousand wrinkles, burned yellow with the sun, and marked with every evil passion, was turned from one to the other of us, while his deep-set, bile-shot eyes, and his high, thin, fleshless nose, gave him somewhat the resemblance to a fierce old bird of prey.

"Which of you is Holmes?" asked this apparition.

"My name, sir; but you have the advantage of me," said my companion quietly.

"I am Dr. Grimesby Roylott, of Stoke Moran."

"Indeed, Doctor," said Holmes blandly. "Pray take a seat."

"I will do nothing of the kind. My stepdaughter has been here. I have traced her. What has she been saying to you?"

"It is a little cold for the time of the year," said Holmes.

"What has she been saying to you?" screamed the old man furiously.

"But I have heard that the crocuses promise well," continued my companion imperturbably.

"Ha! You put me off, do you?" said our new visitor, taking a step forward and shaking his hunting-crop. "I know you, you scoundrel! I have heard of you before. You are Holmes, the meddler."

My friend smiled.

"Holmes, the busybody!"

His smile broadened.

"Holmes, the Scotland Yard Jack-in-office!"

Holmes chuckled heartily. "Your conversation is most entertaining," said he. "When you go out close the door, for there is a decided draught."

"I will go when I have said my say. Don't you dare to meddle with my affairs. I know that Miss Stoner has been here - I traced her! I am a dangerous man to fall foul of! See here." He stepped swiftly forward, seized the poker, and bent it into a curve with his huge brown hands.

"See that you keep yourself out of my grip," he snarled, and hurling the twisted poker into the fireplace he strode out of the room.

"He seems a very amiable person," said Holmes, laughing. "I am not quite so bulky, but if he had remained I might have shown him that my grip was not much more feeble than his own." As he spoke he picked up the steel poker and, with a sudden effort, straightened it out again.

"Fancy his having the insolence to confound me with the official detective force! This incident gives zest to our investigation, however, and I only trust that our little friend will not suffer from her imprudence in allowing this brute to trace her. And now, Watson, we shall order breakfast, and afterwards I shall walk down to Doctors' Commons, where I hope to get some data which may help us in this matter."

It was nearly one o'clock when Sherlock Holmes returned from his excursion. He held in his hand a sheet of blue paper, scrawled over with notes and figures.

"I have seen the will of the deceased wife," said he. "To determine its exact meaning I have been obliged to work out the present prices of the investments with which it is concerned. The total income, which at the time of the wife's death was little short of 1100 pounds, is now, through the fall in agricultural prices, not more than 750 pounds. Each daughter can claim an income of 250 pounds, in case of marriage. It is evident, therefore, that if both girls had married, this beauty would have had a mere pittance, while even one of them would cripple him to a very serious extent. My morning's work has not been wasted, since it has proved that he has the very strongest motives for standing in the way of anything of the sort. And now, Watson, this is too serious for dawdling, especially as the old man is aware that we are interesting ourselves in his affairs; so if you are ready, we shall call a cab and drive to Waterloo. I should be very much obliged if you would slip your revolver into your pocket. An Eley's No. 2 is an excellent argument with gentlemen who can twist steel pokers into knots. That and a tooth-brush are, I think all that we need."

At Waterloo we were fortunate in catching a train for Leatherhead, where we hired a trap at the station inn and drove for four or five miles through the lovely Surrey lanes. It was a perfect day, with a bright sun and a few fleecy clouds in the heavens. The trees and wayside hedges were just throwing out their first green shoots, and the air was full of the pleasant smell of the moist earth. To me at least there was a strange contrast between the sweet promise of the spring and this sinister quest upon which we were engaged. My companion sat in the front of the trap, his arms folded, his hat pulled down over his eyes, and his chin sunk upon his breast, buried in the deepest thought. Suddenly, however, he started, tapped me on the shoulder, and pointed over the meadows.

"Look there!" said he.

A heavily timbered park stretched up in a gentle slope, thickening into a grove at the highest point. From amid the branches there jutted out the gray gables and high roof-top of a very old mansion.

"Stoke Moran?" said he.

"Yes, sir, that be the house of Dr. Grimesby Roylott," remarked the driver.

"There is some building going on there," said Holmes; "that is where we are going."

"There's the village," said the driver, pointing to a cluster of roofs some distance to the left; "but if you want to get to the house, you'll find it shorter to get over this stile, and so by the foot-path over the fields. There it is, where the lady is walking."

"And the lady, I fancy, is Miss Stoner," observed Holmes, shading his eyes. "Yes, I think we had better do as you suggest."

We got off, paid our fare, and the trap rattled back on its way to Leatherhead

"I thought it as well," said Holmes as we climbed the stile, "that this fellow should think we had come here as architects, or on some definite business. It may stop his gossip. Good-afternoon, Miss Stoner. You see that we have been as good as our word."

Our client of the morning had hurried forward to meet us with a face which spoke her joy. "I have been waiting so eagerly for you," she cried, shaking hands with us warmly. "All has turned out splendidly. Dr. Roylott has gone to town, and it is unlikely that he will be back before evening."

"We have had the pleasure of making the doctor's acquaintance," said Holmes, and in a few words he sketched out what had occurred. Miss Stoner turned white to the lips as she listened.

"Good heavens!" she cried, "he has followed me, then."

"So it appears."

"He is so cunning that I never know when I am safe from him. What will he say when he returns?"

"He must guard himself, for he may find that there is someone more cunning than himself upon his track. You must lock yourself up from him to-night. If he is violent, we shall take you away to your aunt's at Harrow. Now, we must make the best use of our time, so kindly take us at once to the rooms which we are to examine."

The building was of gray, lichen-blotched stone, with a high central portion and two curving wings, like the claws of a crab, thrown out on each side. In one of these wings the windows were broken and blocked with wooden boards, while the roof was partly caved in, a picture of ruin. The central portion was in little better repair, but the right-hand block was comparatively modern, and the blinds in the windows, with the blue smoke curling up from the chimneys, showed that this was where the family resided. Some scaffolding had been erected against the end wall, and the stone-work had been broken into, but there were no signs of any workmen at the moment of our visit. Holmes walked slowly up and down the ill-trimmed lawn and examined with deep attention the outsides of the windows.

"This, I take it, belongs to the room in which you used to sleep, the centre one to your sister's, and the one next to the main building to Dr. Roylott's chamber?"

"Exactly so. But I am now sleeping in the middle one."

"Pending the alterations, as I understand. By the way, there does not seem to be any very pressing need for repairs at that end wall."

"There were none. I believe that it was an excuse to move me from my room."

"Ah! that is suggestive. Now, on the other side of this narrow wing runs the corridor from which these three rooms open. There are windows in it, of course?"

"Yes, but very small ones. Too narrow for anyone to pass through."

"As you both locked your doors at night, your rooms were unapproachable from that side. Now, would you have the kindness to go into your room and bar your shutters?"

Miss Stoner did so, and Holmes, after a careful examination through the open window, endeavoured in every way to force the shutter open, but without success. There was no slit through which a knife could be passed to raise the bar. Then with his lens he tested the hinges, but they were of solid iron, built firmly into the massive masonry.

"Hum!" said he, scratching his chin in some perplexity, "my theory certainly presents some difficulties. No one could pass these shutters if they were bolted. Well, we shall see if the inside throws any light upon the matter."

A small side door led into the whitewashed corridor from which the three bedrooms opened. Holmes refused to examine the third chamber, so we passed at once to the second, that in which Miss Stoner was now sleeping, and in which her sister had met with her fate. It was a homely little room, with a low ceiling and a gaping fireplace, after the fashion of old country-houses. A brown chest of drawers stood in one corner, a narrow white counterpane bed in another, and a dressing-table on the left-hand side of the window. These articles, with two small wicker-work chairs, made up all the furniture in the room save for a square of Wilton carpet in the centre. The boards round and the paneling of the walls were of brown, worm-eaten oak, so old and discoloured that it may have dated from the original building of the house. Holmes drew one of the chairs into a corner and sat silent, while his eyes traveled round and round and up and down, taking in every detail of the apartment.

"Where does that bell communicate with?" he asked at last pointing to a thick belt-rop which hung down beside the bed, the tassel actually lying upon the pillow.

"It goes to the housekeeper's room."

"It looks newer than the other things?"

"Yes, it was only put there a couple of years ago."

"Your sister asked for it, I suppose?"

"No, I never heard of her using it. We used always to get what we wanted for ourselves."

"Indeed, it seemed unnecessary to put so nice a bell-pull there. You will excuse me for a few minutes while I satisfy myself as to this floor."

He threw himself down upon his face with his lens in his hand and crawled swiftly backward and forward, examining minutely the cracks between the boards. Then he did the same with the wood-work with which the chamber was paneled. Finally he walked over to the bed and spent some time in staring at it and in running his eye up and down the wall. Finally he took the bell-rope in his hand and gave it a brisk tug.

"Why, it's a dummy," said he.

"Won't it ring?"

"No, it is not even attached to a wire. This is very interesting. You can see now that it is fastened to a hook just above where the little opening for the ventilator is."

"How very absurd! I never noticed that before."

"Very strange!" muttered Holmes, pulling at the rope. "There are one or two very singular points about this room. For example, what a fool a builder must be to open a ventilator into another room, when, with the same trouble, he might have communicated with the outside air!"

"That is also quite modern," said the lady.

"Done about the same time as the bell-rope?" remarked Holmes.

"Yes, there were several little changes carried out about that time."

"They seem to have been of a most interesting character – dummy bell-ropes, and ventilators which do not ventilate. With your permission, Miss Stoner, we shall now carry our researches into the inner apartment."

Dr. Grimesby Roylott's chamber was larger than that of his stepdaughter, but was as plainly furnished. A camp-bed, a small wooden shelf full of books, mostly of a technical character an armchair beside the bed, a plain wooden chair against the wall, a round table, and a large iron safe were the principal things which met the eye. Holmes walked slowly round and examined each and all of them with the keenest interest.

"What's in here?" he asked, tapping the safe.

"My stepfather's business papers."

"Oh! you have seen inside, then?"

"Only once, some years ago. I remember that it was full of papers."

"There isn't a cat in it, for example?"

"No. What a strange idea!"

"Well, look at this!" He took up a small saucer of milk which stood on the top of it.

"No; we don't keep a cat. But there is a cheetah and a baboon."

"Ah, yes, of course! Well, a cheetah is just a big cat, and yet a saucer of milk does not go very far in satisfying its wants, I daresay. There is one point which I should wish to determine." He squatted down in front of the wooden chair and examined the seat of it with the greatest attention.

"Thank you. That is quite settled," said he, rising and putting his lens in his pocket. "Hello! Here is something interesting!"

The object which had caught his eye was a small dog lash hung on one corner of the bed. The lash, however, was curled upon itself and tied so as to make a loop of whipcord.

"What do you make of that, Watson?"

"It's a common enough lash. But I don't know why it should be tied."

"That is not quite so common, is it? Ah, me! it's a wicked world, and when a clever man turns his brains to crime it is the worst of all. I think that I have seen enough now, Miss Stoner, and with your permission we shall walk out upon the lawn."

I had never seen my friend's face so grim or his brow so dark as it was when we turned from the scene of this investigation. We had walked several times up and down the lawn, neither Miss Stoner nor myself liking to break in upon his thoughts before he roused himself from his reverie.

"It is very essential, Miss Stoner," said he, "that you should absolutely follow my advice in every respect."

"I shall most certainly do so."

"The matter is too serious for any hesitation. Your life may depend upon your compliance."

"I assure you that I am in your hands."

"In the first place, both my friend and I must spend the night in your room."

Both Miss Stoner and I gazed at him in astonishment.

"Yes, it must be so. Let me explain. I believe that that is the village inn over there?"

"Yes, that is the Crown."

"Very good. Your windows would be visible from there?"

"Certainly."

"You must confine yourself to your room, on pretence of a headache, when your stepfather comes back. Then when you hear him retire for the night, you must open the shutters of your window, undo the hasp, put your lamp there as a signal to us, and then withdraw quietly with everything which you are likely to want into the room which you used to occupy. I have no doubt that, in spite of the repairs, you could manage there for one night."

"Oh, yes, easily."

"The rest you will leave in our hands."

"But what will you do?"

"We shall spend the night in your room, and we shall investigate the cause of this noise which has disturbed you."

"I believe, Mr. Holmes, that you have already made up your mind," said Miss Stoner, laying her hand upon my companion's sleeve.

"Perhaps I have."

"Then, for pity's sake, tell me what was the cause of my sister's death."

"I should prefer to have clearer proofs before I speak."

"You can at least tell me whether my own thought is correct, and if she died from some sudden fright."

"No, I do not think so. I think that there was probably some more tangible cause. And now, Miss Stoner, we must leave you for if Dr. Roylott returned and saw us our journey would be in vain. Good-bye, and be brave, for if you will do what I have told you, you may rest assured that we shall soon drive away the dangers that threaten you."

Sherlock Holmes and I had no difficulty in engaging a bedroom and sitting-room at the Crown Inn. They were on the upper floor, and from our window we could command a view of the avenue gate, and of the inhabited wing of Stoke Moran Manor House. At dusk we saw Dr. Grimesby Roylott drive past, his huge form looming up beside the little figure of the lad who drove him. The boy had some slight difficulty in undoing the heavy iron gates, and we heard the hoarse roar of the doctor's voice and saw the fury with which he shook his clinched fists at him. The trap drove on, and a few minutes later we saw a sudden light spring up among the trees as the lamp was lit in one of the sitting-rooms.

"Do you know, Watson," said Holmes as we sat together in the gathering darkness, "I have really some scruples as to taking you to-night. There is a distinct element of danger."

"Can I be of assistance?"

"Your presence might be invaluable."

"Then I shall certainly come."

"It is very kind of you."

"You speak of danger. You have evidently seen more in these rooms than was visible to me."

"No, but I fancy that I may have deduced a little more. I imagine that you saw all that I did."

"I saw nothing remarkable save the bell-rope, and what purpose that could answer I confess is more than I can imagine."

"You saw the ventilator, too?"

"Yes, but I do not think that it is such a very unusual thing to have a small opening between two rooms. It was so small that a rat could hardly pass through."

"I knew that we should find a ventilator before ever we came to Stoke Moran."

"My dear Holmes!"

"Oh, yes, I did. You remember in her statement she said that her sister could smell Dr. Roylott's cigar. Now, of course that suggested at once that there must be a communication between the two rooms. It could only be a small one, or it would have been remarked upon at the coroner's inquiry. I deduced a ventilator."

"But what harm can there be in that?"

"Well, there is at least a curious coincidence of dates. A ventilator is made, a cord is hung, and a lady who sleeps in the bed dies. Does not that strike you?"

"I cannot as yet see any connection."

"Did you observe anything very peculiar about that bed?"

"No."

"It was clamped to the floor. Did you ever see a bed fastened like that before?"

"I cannot say that I have."

"The lady could not move her bed. It must always be in the same relative position to the ventilator and to the rope -- or so we may call it, since it was clearly never meant for a bell-pull."

"Holmes," I cried, "I seem to see dimly what you are hinting at. We are only just in time to prevent some subtle and horrible crime."

"Subtle enough and horrible enough. When a doctor does go wrong he is the first of criminals. He has nerve and he has knowledge. Palmer and Pritchard were among the heads of their profession. This man strikes even deeper, but I think, Watson, that we shall be able to strike deeper still. But we shall have horrors enough before the night is over; for goodness' sake let us have a quiet pipe and turn our minds for a few hours to something more cheerful."

About nine o'clock the light among the trees was extinguished, and all was dark in the direction of the Manor House. Two hours passed slowly away, and then, suddenly, just at the stroke of eleven, a single bright light shone out right in front of us.

"That is our signal," said Holmes, springing to his feet; "it comes from the middle window."

As we passed out he exchanged a few words with the landlord, explaining that we were going on a late visit to an acquaintance, and that it was possible that we might spend the night there. A moment later we were out on the dark road, a chill wind blowing in our faces, and one yellow light twinkling in front of us through the gloom to guide us on our sombre errand. There was little difficulty in entering the grounds, for unrepaired breaches gaped in the old park wall. Making our way among the trees, we reached the lawn, crossed it, and were about to enter through the window when out from a clump of laurel bushes there darted what seemed to be a hideous and distorted child, who threw itself upon the grass with writhing limbs and then ran swiftly across the lawn into the darkness.

"My God!" I whispered; "did you see it?"

Holmes was for the moment as startled as I. His hand closed like a vise upon my wrist in his agitation. Then he broke into a low laugh and put his lips to my ear.

"It is a nice household," he murmured. "That is the baboon."

I had forgotten the strange pets which the doctor affected. There was a cheetah, too; perhaps we might find it upon our shoulders at any moment. I confess that I felt easier in my mind when, after following Holmes's example and slipping off my shoes, I found myself inside the bedroom. My companion noiselessly closed the shutters, moved the lamp onto the table, and cast his eyes round the room. All was as we had seen it in the daytime. Then creeping up to me and making a trumpet of his hand, he whispered into my ear again so gently that it was all that I could do to distinguish the words:

"The least sound would be fatal to our plans."

I nodded to show that I had heard.

"We must sit without light. He would see it through the ventilator."

I nodded again.

"Do not go asleep; your very life may depend upon it. Have your pistol ready in case we should need it. I will sit on the side of the bed, and you in that chair."

I took out my revolver and laid it on the corner of the table.

Holmes had brought up a long thin cane, and this he placed upon the bed beside him. By it he laid the box of matches and the stump of a candle. Then he turned down the lamp, and we were left in darkness.

How shall I ever forget that dreadful vigil? I could not hear a sound, not even the drawing of a breath, and yet I knew that my companion sat open-eyed, within a few feet of me, in the same state of nervous tension in which I was myself. The shutters cut off the least ray of light, and we waited in absolute darkness. From outside came the occasional cry of a night-bird, and once at our very window a long drawn catlike whine, which told us that the cheetah was indeed at liberty. Far away we could hear the deep tones of the parish clock, which boomed out every quarter of an hour. How long they seemed, those quarters! Twelve struck, and one and two and three, and still we sat waiting silently for whatever might befall.

Suddenly there was the momentary gleam of a light up in the direction of the ventilator, which vanished immediately, but was succeeded by a strong smell of burning oil and heated metal. Someone in the next room had lit a dark-lantern. I heard a gentle sound of movement, and then all was silent once more, though the smell grew stronger. For half an hour I sat with straining ears. Then suddenly another sound became audible - a very gentle, soothing sound, like that of a small jet of steam escaping continually from a kettle. The instant that we heard it,

Holmes sprang from the bed, struck a match, and lashed furiously with his cane at the bell-pull.

"You see it, Watson?" he yelled. "You see it? "

But I saw nothing. At the moment when Holmes struck the light I heard a low, clear whistle, but the sudden glare flashing into my weary eyes made it impossible for me to tell what it was at which my friend lashed so savagely. I could, however, see that his face was deadly pale and filled with horror and loathing.

He had ceased to strike and was gazing up at the ventilator when suddenly there broke from the silence of the night the most horrible cry to which I have ever listened . It swelled up louder and louder, a hoarse yell of pain and fear and anger all mingled in the one dreadful shriek. They say that away down in the village, and even in the distant parsonage, that cry raised the sleepers from their beds. It struck cold to our hearts, and I stood gazing at Holmes, and he at me, until the last echoes of it had died away into the silence from which it rose.

"What can it mean?" I gasped.

"It means that it is all over," Holmes answered. "And perhaps, after all, it is for the best. Take your pistol, and we will enter Dr. Roylott's room."

With a grave face he lit the lamp and led the way down the corridor. Twice he struck at the chamber door without any reply from within. Then he turned the handle and entered, I at his heels, with the cocked pistol in my hand.

It was a singular sight which met our eyes. On the table stood a dark-lantern with the shutter half open, throwing a brilliant beam of light upon the iron safe, the door of which was ajar. Beside this table, on the wooden chair, sat Dr. Grimesby Roylott clad in a long gray dressing-gown, his bare ankles protruding beneath, and his feet thrust into red heelless Turkish slippers. Across his lap lay the short stock with the long lash which we had noticed during the day. His chin was cocked upward and his eyes were fixed in a dreadful, rigid stare at the corner of the ceiling. Round his brow he had a peculiar yellow band, with brownish speckles, which seemed to be bound tightly round his head. As we entered he made neither sound nor motion.

"The band! the speckled band!" whispered Holmes.

I took a step forward. In an instant his strange headgear began to move, and there reared itself from among his hair the squat diamond-shaped head and puffed neck of a loathsome serpent.

"It is a swamp adder!" cried Holmes -- "the deadliest snake in India. He has died within ten seconds of being bitten. Violence does, in truth, recoil upon the violent, and the schemer falls into the pit which he digs for another. Let us thrust this creature back into its den, and we can then remove Miss Stoner to some place of shelter and let the county police know what has happened."

As he spoke he drew the dog-whip swiftly from the dead man's lap, and throwing the noose round the reptile's neck he drew it from its horrid perch and, carrying it at arm's length, threw it into the iron safe, which he closed upon it.

Such are the true facts of the death of Dr. Grimesby Roylott, of Stoke Moran. It is not necessary that I should prolong a narrative which has already run to too great a length by telling how we broke the sad news to the terrified girl, how we conveyed her by the morning train to the care of her good aunt at Harrow, of how the slow process of official inquiry came to the conclusion that the doctor met his fate while indiscreetly playing with a dangerous pet. The little which I had yet to learn of the case was told me by Sherlock Holmes as we traveled back next day.

"I had," said he, "come to an entirely erroneous conclusion which shows, my dear Watson, how dangerous it always is to reason from insufficient data. The presence of the gypsies, and the use of the word 'band,' which was used by the poor girl, no doubt to explain the appearance which she had caught a hurried glimpse of by the light of her match, were sufficient to put me upon an entirely wrong scent. I can only claim the merit that I instantly reconsidered my position when, however, it became clear to me that whatever danger threatened an occupant of the room could not come either from the window or the door. My attention was speedily drawn, as I have already remarked to you, to this ventilator, and to the bell-rope which hung down to the bed. The discovery that this was a dummy, and that the bed was clamped to the floor, instantly gave rise to the suspicion that the rope was there as a bridge for something passing through the hole and coming to the bed. The idea of a snake instantly occurred to me, and when I coupled it with my knowledge that the doctor was furnished with a supply of creatures from India, I felt that I was probably on the right track. The idea of using a form of poison which could not possibly be discovered by any chemical test was just such a one as would occur to a clever and ruthless man who had had an Eastern training. The rapidity with which such a poison would take effect would also, from his point of view, be an advantage. It would be a sharp-eyed coroner, indeed, who could distinguish the two little dark punctures which would show where the poison fangs had done their work.

Then I thought of the whistle. Of course he must recall the snake before the morning light revealed it to the victim. He had trained it, probably by the use of the milk which we saw, to return to him when summoned. He would put it through this ventilator at the hour that he thought best, with the certainty that it would crawl down the rope and land on the bed. It might or might not bite the occupant, perhaps she might escape every night for a week, but sooner or later she must fall a victim.

"I had come to these conclusions before ever I had entered his room. An inspection of his chair showed me that he had been in the habit of standing on it, which of course would be necessary in order that he should reach the ventilator. The sight of the safe, the saucer of milk, and the loop of whipcord were enough to finally dispel any doubts which may have remained. The metallic clang heard by Miss Stoner was obviously caused by her stepfather hastily closing the door of his safe upon its terrible occupant. Having once made up my mind, you know the steps which I took in order to put the matter to the proof. I heard the creature hiss as I have no doubt that you did also, and I instantly lit the light and attacked it."

"With the result of driving it through the ventilator."

"And also with the result of causing it to turn upon its master at the other side. Some of the blows of my cane came home and roused its snakish temper, so that it flew upon the first person it saw. In this way I am no doubt indirectly responsible for Dr. Grimesby Roylott's death, and I cannot say that it is likely to weigh very heavily upon my conscience."

The End

Glossary of Terms Used in the Story

affected – showed a liking for averted – turned away

aperture – opening

bile-shot eyes – eyes whose whites are colored brownish yellow or greenishyellow

blandly – showing no concern or worry

bramble-covered – covered with prickly shrubs or bushes

camp-bed – folding bed

clinched fists – clenched fists

counterpane – bedspread

dark lantern — lantern with sliding door dog-cart – a cart with two seats placed back-to-back; name is derived from a box under rear seat originally used to carry dogs dog lash – dog leash

dissolute – indulged in sensual pleasures or vices

draught – draft

fain — gladly, willingly

fortnight — two weeks

frock-coat — close fitting, double-breasted, knee-length coat gable — part of house that is enclosed by part of the roof that slopes downward

gaiters — cover for the ankle and instep, spats

hasp – metal fastener with a hinged, slotted part that fits over a projecting part and is secured by a bolt herald – a sign of something to come insolence – arrogance; impertinence

Jack-in-office – a petty official unjustifiably claiming distinction or merit knock you up – wake you by knocking at the door

lichen-blotched – spotted with a fungus that forms a crust-like or branching growth

livid – discolored as from a bruise; black-and-blue

morose – gloomy

parapet – low protective wall

parish clock – church clock

parsonage – residence provided by a church for its parson pauper – extremely poor person pittance – very small amount of money retorted – returned like for like; retaliated return ticket – round trip ticket

The Regency – 1811-1820, last 9 years of George III's reign when he was insane

sounded – examined something by causing it to emit sound squire – a country gentleman especially one who is the principal landowner in a village staples – U-shaped metal loops with pointed ends, driven into a surface to hold bolts or wiring in place

reverie – daydream

scruples – uneasy feelings arising from conscience singular – beyond what is ordinary or usual; remarkable stile – steps over a fence

stump – short piece

trap – one-horse, two-wheeled, open carriage vigil – watch kept during normal sleeping hours

whipcord – strong, twisted or braided cord used as a whip whitewashed – covered with a mixture of lime and water to whiten it

Wilton carpet – carpet with lush surface loops of yarn; named for the town in Southwestern England where it was first made

A Reader's Guide

Arthur Conan Doyle

(A Short Biography)

The Tin Box began with the entry on Conan Doyle in Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia and then edited it substantially.

Sir Arthur Ignatius Conan Doyle, DL (b. May 22, 1859 in Edinburgh – d. July 7, 1930) was a Scottish author most noted for his stories about the detective Sherlock Holmes. His use of the private detective and “ratiocination” (to reason methodically and logically) are generally considered his major innovations in the field of crime fiction. He was a prolific writer, whose other works include science fiction stories, historical novels, plays, romances, poetry, non-fiction, and writings on spiritualism. Conan was originally a middle name but he used it as part of his surname in his later years.

His parents (Charles Altamont Doyle and Mary Doyle) were Irish. His extended family was quite prosperous, including several uncles who were well known artists. However, his father was a minor artist who suffered from alcoholism. Because of his father’s addiction and frequent hospitalizations, Arthur Conan Doyle’s immediate family was poor. When he was nine years old, his more wealthy relatives paid for him to attend Hodder, the preparatory school for the Jesuit school Stonyhurst.

From 1876 to 1881, he studied medicine at the University of Edinburgh (likely at least partially paid for by a physician who was renter in his mother's lodging house). Having inherited his mother's ability to tell a good story, Conan Doyle began writing stories while still a medical student. His first literary publication was published anonymously before he was 20 years old. While still a student, he accepted a summer job as a ship's doctor on a whaling boat, where he nearly died from frostbite. When he graduated, he accepted another position as ship's doctor, this time on a voyage to the West African coast, and he nearly died from fever. On his return in 1882, he settled in Plymouth to join the medical practice of a former co-student. Upset by his partner's ethics and almost penniless, Conan Dole left and established his own practice in Southsea, Portsmouth later that year.

His early medical practice was not very successful. Therefore, while waiting for patients, he continued to write stories and submit them for publication. In 1883, he published his first story under his own name. In 1885 Conan Doyle married Louisa Hawkins. Slowly but surely, his medical practice began to improve. However, he continued to write.

He published his first Sherlock Holmes story, "A Study in Scarlet," in Beeton's Christmas Annual in 1887. Conan Doyle was heavily influenced by Edgar Allan Poe, who had written the first detective story. However, Conan Doyle wanted to write mysteries where the clues were obvious if the reader saw the right things. He felt that previous mysteries relied too much on luck or on hiding clues from the readers. The Holmes character was modeled after Conan Doyle's former medical school professor, Dr. Joseph Bell. According to Conan Doyle, Dr. Bell could identify a patient's occupation just by looking at him or her. Conan Doyle wanted Holmes to bring to the detective business the same kind of approach that Bell brought to diagnosing illnesses. Interestingly, the author Robert Lewis Stevenson wrote to Conan Doyle congratulating him on his Sherlock Holmes story and asked, " Only the one thing troubles me: can this be my old friend Joe Bell?"

In 1889, Conan Doyle published the (non-Sherlockian) novel Micah Clarke, and, in 1890, he published his second Sherlock Holmes novel, The Sign of Four. Coincidentally, his medical practice also flourished during this period. However, in 1891, Conan Doyle closed his now successful Southsea practice and moved to Vienna, Austria to study ophthalmology. Unfortunately, he was not fluent enough in German for the education to be very valuable. Later that year, he left Vienna and moved to London to set up a practice as an ophthalmologist. He wrote in his autobiography that not a single patient crossed his door. However, it gave him time to write, and he decided to give up the practice of medicine completely and to write for a living.

He thought of an innovative idea. At that time, if an author serialized a story in a magazine over a period of months, the magazine published individual chapters of the same story until the entire story was published. If the reader missed any issues, the reader missed those chapters. Conan Doyle came up with the idea of writing a series of short stories, one of which could be published each month. He would use the same main characters, but each month's story would be a complete adventure. He thought about which one of his characters he could use as his main character, and his Sherlock Holmes came to mind. He proposed his idea to a new monthly magazine that had just begun publication, The Strand Magazine. The Strand accepted Conan Doyle's proposal and published his first twelve Sherlock Holmes Adventures. They were an immediate hit with the public.

The Strand ordered more stories from Doyle – and then wanted more.

But Conan Doyle eventually became tired of writing the Sherlock Holmes mysteries. In November 1891 he wrote to his mother: "I think of slaying Holmes... and winding him up for good and all. He takes my mind from better things." She convinced him not to do it in 1891. However, in December 1893, he did so in order to dedicate more of his time to more "important" works (namely his historical novels). In the short story "The Final Problem," Holmes and his arch-nemesis, Professor Moriarty, apparently plunged to their deaths together down a waterfall.

Over time, it was clear that, whatever Conan Doyle thought of Holmes, the public really missed him (and Doyle could use the money that Holmes brought in to fund his other interests). In 1901, Conan Doyle brought Holmes back in a memoir that was supposed to have occurred before the Reichenbach (The Hound of the Baskervilles). In 1903, Conan Doyle resumed the short story approach with "The Adventure of the Empty House." (You'll have to read the adventure to see how Conan Doyle explained Holmes's apparent death and resurrection.) Holmes eventually appeared in a total of 56 short stories and four Conan Doyle novels (and he has since appeared in many novels and stories by other authors). Conan Doyle's last Sherlock Holmes story was published in 1927.

Following the Boer War in South Africa at the turn of the 20th century and the condemnation from around the world over the United Kingdom's conduct in it, Conan Doyle wrote a short pamphlet titled The War in South Africa: Its Cause and Conduct. It justified the UK's role in the Boer war and was widely translated. Conan Doyle believed that it was this pamphlet that resulted in his being knighted in 1902. He also wrote the longer book The Great Boer War in 1900. During the early years of the 20th century, Sir Arthur twice ran for Parliament as a Liberal Unionist, once in Edinburgh and once in the Border Burghs. Although he received a respectable vote, he was not elected.

In 1906, Conan Doyle's wife finally succumbed to tuberculosis, from which she had suffered for years. Conan Doyle married Jean Leckie in 1907. He had five children, two (Mary and Kingsley) with his first wife and three (Jean, Denis, and Adrian) with his second wife.

Conan Doyle was also a fervent advocate of justice, and personally investigated two closed cases, which led to two imprisoned men being released. The first case, in 1906, involved a shy half-British, half-Indian lawyer named George Edalji, who had allegedly penned threatening letters and mutilated animals. Police were set on Edalji's conviction, even though the mutilations continued after their suspect was jailed. It was partially as a result of this case that the Court of Criminal Appeal was established in 1907. Therefore, not only did Conan Doyle help George Edalji, but his work helped to establish a way to correct other miscarriages of justice.

The second case involved Oscar Slater, a German Jew and gambling-den operator, convicted of bludgeoning an 82-year-old woman in Glasgow in 1908. It excited Conan Doyle's curiosity because of inconsistencies in the prosecution's case and a general sense that Slater was framed. Slater was also eventually freed.

In 1912, Conan Doyle published The Lost World, which introduced another enduring fictional character, the irascible Professor Challenger, who would return in two further novels.

In 1916, Conan Doyle wrote for the first time about his belief in spiritualism – the idea that one can communicate with people who have died. Alleged scientific proof of such communication is a subject that will dominate the remaining years of his life.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle died of a heart attack in 1930, at age 71, and is buried in the Church Yard at Minstead in the New Forest, Hampshire, England.

A statue has been erected in Conan Doyle's honor. It may be seen at Crowborough Cross in Crowborough, East Sussex, England, where Sir Arthur lived for 23 years. There is also a statue of Sherlock Holmes in Picardy Place, Edinburgh, Scotland - close to the house where Conan Doyle was born.

For further reading about Conan Doyle, see the following: Stashower, Daniel, Teller of Tales, Henry Holt & Company, NY, 1999. It is available in both print and audio-book at Howard County Library.

The following pre-reading activities, reading approach, and post reading activities are offered to make the help the students think critically. Teachers may encourage children to read them before they begin reading the story.

Pre-Reading Activities

- Feel free to talk with someone about the story before you read it. Perhaps, a friend or your mom or dad can read the story, as well.
- Think about what you already might know about the subject. Have you read any Sherlock Holmes stories before? Have you read any other mysteries?
- If you want, make predictions about what you think the story might be about. What do you think will happen? Why is the title of the story The Adventure of the Speckled Band?
- Other pre-reading activities could include:
 1. Research information about Sir Arthur Conan Doyle.
 2. Create a time-line for the major events both in England and around the world for period spanning the 1870s-1920s.
 3. Look at map of England. Locate London, Surrey, Harrow, Berkshire, Hampshire, Waterloo, and Leatherhead.
 4. Research information pertaining to the Sherlock Holmes stories.
 5. Research information about gypsies in England in the late 1800s. Helpful hint: the preferred name for these people is either Roma or Scinti. These names refer to the ethnic backgrounds of these nomadic people.

Reading Approach

- If you have a photocopied version of this story, feel free to write your thoughts next to the text, so you can keep notes.
- While you are reading the story, try to think about similar experiences that you may have had. Have you ever been to a country house such as the one that is mentioned in the story?
- Ask yourself questions about the people, places, and events in the story. Are they logical? Are they believable? Try to analyze things that happen in the story. Why do the characters behave the way they do? Why do particular events occur the way they do? If something confuses you, discuss it with someone.
- Visualize the story. Think of how you might make it into a movie. How would you stage the events in the story? What do you think the characters look like? What do the settings in which the story takes place look like?
- Make predictions while you are reading the story. What do you think will happen next? Does the plot follow the predictions you are making?

Critical Reading Questions

When you are reading Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes mystery the Adventure of the Speckled Band, try to look for information relating to the following questions. In addition, ask questions and make predictions about the story as you read. Seek out answers to your questions and make judgments about the way the story unfolds. Look up any vocabulary words you do not know and write their definitions in the margins.

1. What is the point of view of this story? Who is the narrator?
2. Who are the main characters?
3. What is the setting of the story? Does the setting change at all?
4. What is the central conflict? How is it resolved?
5. Are there long paragraphs of description? What purpose do they serve?
6. Are there important objects in the story? Are they symbolic in any way?
7. Are there any unexpected or surprising turn of events?
8. Identify at least two themes that emerge from the story?

Predictions (during reading)

1. What do you think the speckled band might be?
2. What do you think was making the whistling sound?
3. Do you think Sherlock Holmes will take the case? Why or why not?
4. What do you think happened to Miss Stoner's sister?

Post Reading Activities

(The following post reading suggestions are intended to help the students take note of specific information that is clearly stated in the text and to promote analytical thinking. Teachers may want the classes to discuss the story before the students begin to write their essays. Teachers may even choose to require students to write answers to any or all of the questions prior to discussion.)

Sometimes, rereading a story can help you to understand it better. The first time that you read a story (particularly a mystery like The Speckled Band), you often read it just to find out what happens. However, the second time you read a story, you often notice new things and discover new insights and details. Lovers of the Sherlock Holmes stories re-read the adventures many times and discover new ideas each time they do so. Rereading a story can help you really understand it.

After you have read the story, visualize it again. Think of the facts in the story, for example, “Who is Mrs. Hudson?” “Where does Sherlock Holmes reside?”

Summarize the story for yourself. Decide what was important.

In addition, begin to analyze the characters, plot, style, and other points of the story. For example, “What kind of man is Dr. Roylott?” “What technique did Arthur Conan Doyle use to make us feel nervous while Holmes and Watson waited in Helen Stoner's bedroom?”

Some Factual Questions

1. Why does Helen Stoner seek Holmes's help?
2. Why did Dr. Roylott spend time in jail?
3. According to Helen Stoner, what were the facts surrounding her sister's death?
4. Why would Dr. Roylott have been opposed to his stepdaughters marrying?
5. What peculiarities does Holmes find upon his inspection of the bedrooms?
6. Why does Holmes want Miss Stoner to confine herself to her bedroom?
7. How did Holmes know there would be a ventilator in the rooms?

8. What happens to Dr. Roylott?
9. What was the “speckled band?”
10. Can you look at other Holmes stories and find at least two other cases that Holmes solved before Watson joined him?
11. What was the relationship between England and India that enabled Dr. Roylott to move to Calcutta and start a medical practice?
12. Can you find any peculiar facts in the story?
13. What was the "Doctors' Commons?"
14. What would Dr. Roylott's annual income have been if Helen Stoner got married?

Some Analytical Questions

1. Why do you think Dr. Roylott uses physical force in his meeting with Holmes
2. Why does Sir Arthur Conan Doyle spend so much time developing descriptions of nature?
3. Why do you think that Conan Doyle introduced the presence of the gypsies? What do you think about that?
4. Why do you think Doyle chooses to make Watson the narrator? Is the limited point of view effective in developing a comprehensive picture of the characters?

Essay Writing Tips

Watson's Tin Box has collaborated with Howard County School System to incorporate the System's approach toward essay writing. It is okay if you want to let the students experiment with role or point of view. Feel free to use it as a creative writing exercise. The following are standard rules and are consistent with the rubric that will be used to judge the essays.

Thinking About Your Essay

Feel free to be creative. Read the essay questions and select one that you find interesting, challenging, and worth writing about. Use a prewriting strategy (web, bulleted list, graphic organizer) that you are comfortable with to gather and organize ideas for your answer, as well as details from the story that suggest your interpretations are strong.

Before you start to write your essay, focus on:

- The Role or perspective from which you want to write the essay
- The Audience you want to address
- The Format in which to write
- The Topic about which to write
- A Strong Verb that suggests the purpose of the writing (such as persuade, analyze, create, predict or compare)

First, you can list your choices for each of these categories. Then, write a paragraph that identifies the role from which you want to write the essay, who you want to pretend your audience is, what format you are going to use, what impact you want your essay to have, and what your topic is going to be.

For example:

You are Dr. Watson (Role). You want to write a letter (Format) to Sherlock Holmes (Audience) analyzing (Strong Verb) your friendship (Topic).

Of course, the audience could simply be Watson's Tin Box.

Before you start writing, ask yourself what you know about the role you adopt and the audience you are writing for. Think about the approach you will use to support your opinion. What sort of detail from the story would grab your audience's attention?

The Traditional Structural Rules

If you choose to write a straight forward analytical essay, write about the story using a formal tone. Try to not use "I" in your essay. Please do not write a plot summary or a biography of the Conan Doyle. You should try to cite the text or use details, examples, quotations, and paraphrases to support your views.

The essay should include an introductory paragraph, main body paragraphs, and a conclusion paragraph.

The introduction should set up the general discussion of your subject. It should lead to a very specific statement of your main point. It is often recommended that essays begin with a "grabber," such as raising a surprising point or a challenging claim that will "grab" the reader's attention and introduces the main point of your analysis. This is called the "thesis sentence." The introduction paragraph should summarize what your overall point, thesis, or argument is going to be in the main body paragraphs of your essay.

Each main body paragraph should discuss a single idea, reason, or example that supports your argument or thesis. Each paragraph should begin with a clear topic sentence (a summary that describes the main point of the paragraph) and as much information as is necessary to explain your argument. Try to use details, references, examples, and citations from the story to make your thesis clear and your arguments convincing. All of the points raised in your body paragraph should support your main thesis.

You should begin your conclusion paragraph with a restatement of your main thesis. However, do not just repeat your thesis sentence. Discuss why you think that your thesis is important to the understanding of the story. Since this is the last piece of the essay that the reader will read, think about the idea or feeling that you want to leave your reader with. The conclusion should be specific in contrast to the introduction.

Make sure that you show how your ideas in the body paragraphs are related to each other. These “transitions” connect your arguments to one another. Use either or both the last sentence of one paragraph and/or the first sentence (the topic sentence) of the next to show how the two ideas are related. Sometimes it is helpful to think about how the ideas compare or contrast. For example, does one paragraph discuss one fact and the second paragraph discuss a fact of greater significance (“More importantly...”) ? Do they contrast? Are they being seen from different character’s perspectives?

Make sure that you have a transition from the last body paragraph to your conclusion paragraph. Sometimes, it is suggested to sum up the third body paragraph with some reminders of your other paragraphs. Don’t restate the topics fully because you will do that in the conclusion paragraph.

Essay Questions

Teachers (if the child is participating through the School System) or parents (if the child is participating through the Library) may choose one of the questions below and assign it to the children as their essay topic, or they may let the children choose from the list. In cases where a child becomes particularly interested in an aspect of the story and wants to use that as the topic for his or her essay, the child is required to talk about it first with their teacher or parent in order to assure that they have a well defined issue and an appropriate approach to writing the essay.

Once again, students may experiment with point of view, role, audience, format, etc. in writing their essays.

We recommend that students address one of the following pre-defined questions in their essays:

1. Watson explains that Sherlock Holmes works for “the love of his art”. Find examples from the text that illustrate this statement.
2. Watson also describes Holmes’s preference for cases that, “tend towards the unusual, and even the fantastic.” Do you agree that this story meets that criterion?
3. How do you describe the relationship between Dr. Watson and Sherlock Holmes? Be sure to support your claims with examples from the text.
4. How believable are Holmes's deductions about Miss Stoner upon her arrival?
5. How would you describe the relationship between Dr. Roylott and his step-daughters? Support your opinions with textual evidence.
6. How was Dr. Roylott’s death ironic?
7. Why do you think Doyle chooses not to fully develop his antagonist, Dr. Roylott?
8. Why do you think that Doyle chose to tell the story through the eyes of Dr. Watson?

If you have a well defined aspect of the story that you prefer to address, you may write the essay on that issue, only after receiving approval from your teacher (if you are participating in the contest through the school) or parent (if you are participating through the Library). The following are simply some suggestions to help you think about the essay you are to write if you choose not to use one of the pre-defined questions.

- You may choose to analyze a single character or compare/contrast two characters, including a discussion of motivation, behavior, attitudes, interaction with other characters, etc.
- Are there any important symbols in the story? What are the specific symbols? Are these symbols part of a pattern that points toward a theme?
- Analyze the use of imagery (colors, smells, textures, shapes, sounds, etc.) in the story. To what senses do these images appeal (sight, smell, touch, and hearing)? How do they enhance our pleasure and understanding of the story?
- Discuss the point of view of a narrative. Why did Conan Doyle choose this angle? How does it affect the reader's response? How would the story change if told from a different point of view?
- Discuss how the setting of the story contributes to it. How does it support or conflict with the character's behavior or the conflict in the story? Does it set a mood?
- What is the central conflict in the story? (But be careful not to write a plot summary.) Show how its resolution illustrates the author's purpose. Analyze the theme of the story. Is there a "universal truth" that Conan Doyle was attempting to convey through the adventure?

Students will be judged on the quality of their essays, not on whether they choose or do not choose one of the pre-defined questions.

Rubric to be Used in Judging the Contest

	1	2	3	4	5	Score
	Experimenting	Emerging	Developing	Effective	Strong
Ideas	Searching for a topic; Limited information; Vague details; Random thoughts	Hints at topic; Reader left with many unanswered questions; Sporadic details; Glimmer of Main Point	General topic defined; Reasonably clear ideas; Details present but not precise; Shows some specifics	Topic fairly narrowed; new ways of thinking about topic attempted; Credible details with some support; Writer understands topic	Narrow and manageable topic; Clear, focused, and answers readers' questions; Relevant and accurate details; Shows insight into topic
Organization	No lead or conclusion; Sequencing not present; No awareness of pacing; Hard to follow	Ineffective lead & conclusion; Some sequencing apparent; Pacing awkward; Some attempt at structure	Routine lead & conclusion; Mainly logical sequencing; Pacing generally under control; Common structures detract from content	Effective lead & conclusion; Sequencing works well; Well controlled pacing; Smooth flow	Inviting introduction and satisfying conclusion; Masterful sequencing; Artful pacing used for stylistic effect; Structure showcases the central ideas of theme
Voice	No concern for audience; Lifeless & mechanical; Flat or inappropriate; Purpose not present	Occasionally aware of audience; General statements require reader interpretation; Tries to engage reader; Hints at purpose	Occasionally intrigues the reader; Pleasing, yet "safe;" Writer/reader connection fades in and out; Purpose inconsistent	Interesting and informative; Pleasing, takes risks; Engages reader most of the time; Purpose consistent	Compelling and engaging; Takes effective risks; reflects interest in and commitment to topic; Purpose is clear and powerful
Word Choice	Vocabulary is limited; Simple words used incorrectly; No figurative language; Words do not convey meaning	Generally correct words, no spice; Language is functional ; Attempts interesting words; Words convey general meaning	Some active verbs and precise nouns; A moment or two of sparkle; Experiments with figurative language; Words begin to enhance meaning	Effective and creative verbs and nouns; Wording mostly correct; Figurative language is effective; Words and phrases work well	Specific and accurate verbs and nouns; Wording is natural, effective, and correct; Verbs and nouns add depth; Figurative language enhance and clarify; Striking words and phrases
Sentence Fluency	Choppy, rambling, or incomplete; No "sentence sense;" Oral reading not possible; Repetitive beginnings	Some simple sentences; Occasional connecting word use; Oral reading difficult; Attempts variation in sentence beginnings	Attempts compound and complex sentences; Sentences usually connect; Parts invite oral reading; Sentences begin in different ways	Begins to have easy flow and rhythm; Strong and varied structure; Oral reading encourages expression in places; Sentences well crafted	Polished rhythm, cadence, and flow; Creative use of sentence length and structure; Invites expressive reading; Sentences enhance meaning
Conventions	Spelling errors impede readability; Incorrect Punctuation & capitalization; Many grammar errors; Lack of paragraphing	Spelling errors on easy words; Errors on basic punctuation & capitalization; Some usage & grammar errors; Occasional use of paragraphing	Spelling generally correct on basic words; Routine punctuation & capitalization; Grammar errors infrequent; Consistent paragraphing	Few spelling errors even on difficult words; Consistent use of punctuation & capitalization; Grammar and usage correct; Paragraphing stylistically effective	Spelling correct even on more difficult words; Accurate & creative use of punctuation & capitalization; Grammar and usage contribute to clarity and style; Sound and creative paragraphing
Presentation	Random spacing or lack of spacing; Poor use of white space; Overall appearance unacceptable	Some thought given to spacing; Attempts margins/headers; Overall appearance is distracting	Attempts consistent spacing; Margins/headers effective; Overall appearance is acceptable	Spacing improves clarity; Experiments with graphic elements; Overall appearance shows balance and proportion	Good balance of space and text; Effectively integrates graphic elements; Overall appearance is pleasing

Watson's Tin Box of Ellicott City
2008 – 2009 Sherlock Holmes Essay Contest
For Seventh Grade Students
Official Entry Form and Cover Sheet.

This Entry Form should be photocopied and stapled to the top of the essay. A student should photocopy this entry form and staple it to the front of his/her essay. Essays received by Watson's Tin Box without a stapled cover sheet will not be read and will not be eligible for prizes. None of the information provided will be used for any purpose unrelated to this essay contest.

Essays must be received by Watson's Tin Box, in care of 5612 Thicket Lane, Columbia, MD 21044, no later than June 5, 2009 to be eligible for the prizes.

Student's name: _____

Grade level: _____

Age: _____

Home Address: _____

Phone number: _____

Email Address: _____

Sponsoring teacher's name (if entering via the Library, please still identify your teacher):

School name (home-schooled students may just indicate such):

School address: _____
